Example: Should advertising to children be banned? (2)

In conclusion then, children are possibly at risk from advertising, but the risk is balanced against commercial interests.

A restriction, particularly on food products, could perhaps protect children's health. However, business would be threatened by any greater controls, and this might in turn rebound on children by lowering the quality of television programmes available to them. Perhaps what is needed most is more research on this subject so that any public debate and any demands made to industry would have the benefit of a greater foundation on which to act.
